ABSTRACT

Borders, whether geographical, political, military, cultural or intellectual, were constantly created and recreated by the different communities they served throughout time. In doing so, borders helped construct identities and alterities, and, therefore, points of contact, divergence or even conflict, some of which with long-lasting effects. Understanding the nature and role of diverse types of borders in the communities of Antiquity - both the meanings they stood for and the practices they originated – is crucial to understand the concept itself, its diversity, evolution and variance in time and space. Given so, this panel, invites studies on borders set in this vast chronology: studies on the idea, constitution, contestation, representation, experience or implications of borders in a chronology “foreign” to the modern concept, but a chronology that could, nevertheless, contribute to the current critique of the subject, by bringing new perspectives and case studies to the discussion.

Catarina Miranda is an Ancient History PhD candidate at the School of Social Sciences and Humanities of NOVA University of Lisbon, with the support FCT through the attribution of a PhD scholarship in 2020. She graduated in History with merit from the same institution, after which she continued into a Master degree in Egyptology. Catarina is a researcher at CHAM, integrating the research group "Antiquity and its Reception". She has participated in the organization of several activities of the group, from events directed to the general public, to scientific encounters, such as the "VIIIth European Conference of Egyptologists". She has taught at the university an introductory course of Middle Egyptian and some classes both of the Master degree in Egyptology and the undergraduate course in History. Catarina has also participated with communications in several scientific meetings, both in Portugal and abroad.
